Republicans are so worried about the midterm elections, they're willing to admit that certain portions of the country are literally uninhabitable. In an interview with NPR published Wednesday, Indiana Gov. Eric Holcomb (R) revealed that the state is having a difficult time attracting new companies to Indiana because of the high costs of doing business there. According to The Indianapolis Star, he explained that Indiana's taxes are "much too high" and are killing its tax base and thus the state. ADVERTISEMENT "We have tax rates in this state that are just way too high," he said. "We have a business climate that is not attractive. We also have a distribution costs that are probably the highest in the nation." "Do you think Indiana could win the NBA Finals?" he continued. "I do not. Because our state still doesn't have a professional sports team," he said. "We need to lower our taxes," he said. "We need to improve our infrastructure, and we need to make sure that we're a fun place to live and work. We have a work ethic here, but we also need fun in our lives." Holcomb added that he hopes to be able to show his constituents that his leadership has proven successful by getting Indiana to have, "a fun place to live and work." "This can be a big state or a small state or a medium-sized state, but we need to focus on our strengths," he said. "We need to focus on our educational strengths, our agricultural strengths, our competitive advantages." To make the state appealing to f678ea9f9e
